

EMBODY ABUNDANCE

In a recent interview, Elon Musk said,
"Money won't matter in 2036. What do you want money for?"

You want money for goods and services.

Well, if that is so abundant that the robots and AI are providing more goods and services than any human could possibly consume, what do you need money for in that case?

These things were relevant in the past.

They will not be relevant in the future.

Inflation is simply the ratio of money to goods and services.

If the output of goods and services increases dramatically,
if it increases 1000%,

you can literally create money in the database.

Provided the creation of that money is less than the rate at which goods and services increase,
you'll actually have deflation.

I'll make a prediction:

deflation will be the issue, not inflation.

Because as the output of goods and services increases past the money supply, you will have deflation."

Most of the comments I saw regarding this were negative.

Only one reflected consciousness.

Nothing he said is negative. We do not seek money.

We seek resources. Money has always been the medium used to exchange for those resources. AI and robots do not need money.

Their purpose is to produce goods and services.

If AI and robotics eventually perform every human job and provide goods and services in overwhelming abundance,
the need for money naturally diminishes

because the purpose money served diminishes.

Earth already provides everything we need to live abundantly.

The challenge has never been the existence of resources
but how humanity organizes and distributes them.

People are reading a script they do not comprehend.

They ask for logic and facts but reject them when they hear them. He is a billionaire. By their own standards, they should value what he is saying. Instead, they dismiss him because they believe his resources are unattainable while he is stating that resources themselves are abundant.

This reveals how consciousness shapes perception.

Two people can hear the exact same statement and experience entirely different realities. One hears unemployment, loss, and fear. The other hears abundance, freedom, and possibility. If you enter this season embodying abundance, you are abundant.

If you enter it convinced that robots will take your job, leave you broke, and condemn you to scarcity, your mind will continually search for evidence that confirms those fears.

Fear narrows perception. Abundance expands it.

The future will not simply expose technology.

It will expose consciousness.

It will reveal whether people are attached to money or whether they understand that money has never been the destination.

Resources have.

Money has never been the goal. Resources are.

If technology creates abundance, then the conversation shifts from protecting money to expanding access to resources.

Fear asks, "What will I lose?"

Abundance asks, "What becomes possible?"

MONEY DOES NOT MATTER.

Your relationship with money should be this:

Money is a frequency to embody. Currency, in its tangible form, is simply a medium of exchange for resources. If your desire is more money so you can obtain more resources, say that.

There is nothing wrong with that. Everyone desires resources.

In today's society, governments have structured systems where currency is the primary means of accessing those resources.

In many cases, if you do not have enough money, you must fall below a certain threshold or meet specific qualifications before you are considered worthy of assistance.

I was not worthy in their eyes.

Everything I am receiving today is something people around me said I would never have because they were reading a script that was never mine. They projected their limitations onto my reality and believed what was possible for me based on their beliefs, not my consciousness.

When I said I would win the lottery jackpot, almost no one believed me. Even those who wanted to support me carried doubt because they were reading a different script.

I was living mine.

Your consciousness determines the script you embody.

The world may tell you what is realistic,

what is attainable, and what you should expect.

You decide whether to accept that script or write your own.

I chose my own.

I do not measure wealth

by the amount of currency someone possesses.

I measure it by their relationship with abundance.
